

Transcript of a real therapy session

Counselor Strategies

Empathy Building, Reframing, Thought Experiment, Evidence-based Questioning

Client Psychological Graph

Synthetic Client Profiles

Profile 1: Elena Novak, 28, female, single, graphic designer, bachelor degree, lives alone, close with parents, finds herself constantly overthinking interactions with colleagues, missed an important deadline because she was too anxious to ask for help.

Profile 2: Raj Patel, 45, male, married, wife and one child, accountant, bachelor degree, difficulty expressing thoughts and feelings and often feels misunderstood by family, wife thinks he's becoming too withdrawn and it's affecting the relationship.
....

Profile n: Alex Johnson, 26, non-binary, single, barista, high school graduate, estranged from family, gets overwhelmed by self-doubt and worries about not fitting in, started after moving to new city, started isolating more and need help to change that.

Synthetic Counseling Sessions

Session 1: ...
Client: ..usually happens when I have to give feedback. I'm worried my comments won't be taken seriously.
Counselor: It can definitely be tough. Let's try to imagine a colleague makes a comment that could be seen as a slight or a joke. What could be a different way to interpret that comment?
Client: Maybe they're just trying to lighten the mood, or they didn't mean it the way I took it.
Counselor: Exactly. Sometimes, giving ourselves the chance to see multiple interpretations can reduce the intensity of those feelings. How do you think this might help with your interactions at work?...

Session 2: ...
Client: Just the other day, I was trying to explain something to my wife, and it came out all wrong. She thought I was upset with her, but I wasn't.
Counselor: It must be frustrating to feel misunderstood. Imagine a conversation where you felt understood and heard. What did you do differently?
Client: In those situations, I was calm and didn't overthink my words. It felt natural.
Counselor: That's insightful. Staying present can really make a difference. How might you bring that calmness into your next conversation?...

Session n: ...
Client: When I'm with new people, I start worrying about what they think of me. I overthink everything I say.
Counselor: That sounds really challenging, constantly questioning yourself like that. Let's try looking at this from a different angle. What if you could view these interactions as opportunities to learn about people, instead of as tests you have to pass?
Client: I think it's partly because I never felt like I fit in, even back home. Now, it's like I have to prove myself all over again.
Counselor: It makes sense that a big change like moving to a new city would amplify those feelings. What do you value most in yourself that you wish others would see?
Client: I like to think I'm a kind person, and I try to be supportive of others....